Comments from the typist – Mary L. Stephenson

October, 2005

Its purpose was to summarize the buying and selling of land (on the most part) by the Poe and Allied families in the Frederick County Maryland area, and to recap of the Deeds (perhaps we) have all acquired over the years, or specifically from Alexander McIntosh's personal files in the 1980's.

The Counties have set forth typists to review the deeds and offer their abridged versions in Abstracts also available through government agencies and/or associations. It is from the Abstracts or McIntosh's comments that I make this Summary. I do not possess being an authority on just matters.

Feel free to make comment, edit changes or add to the Summary.

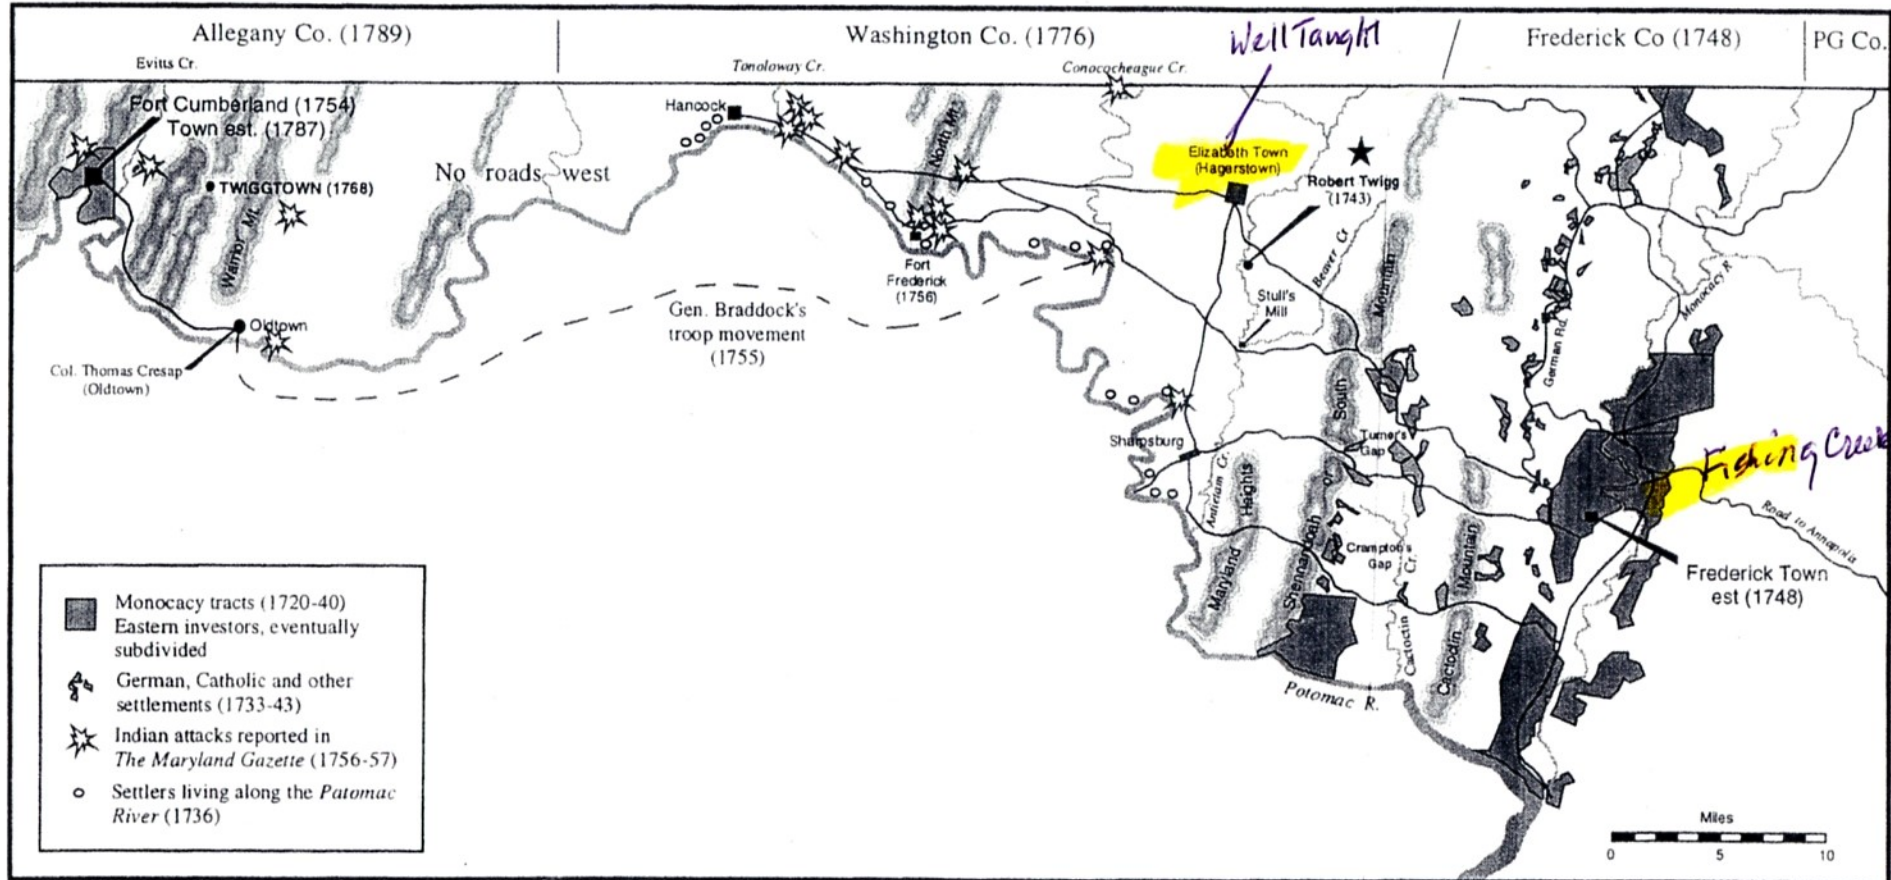

Western Maryland The Early Years

GEORGE HORVATH,

The Olde Map Shop

Sykesville, MD 21784-8160

HORVATHMAP@aol.com

This map was prepared in order to give a perspective view of the relationship between the settlements east of the Shenandoah Mountains and those who moved beyond this range and along the Potomac River. Robert Twigg's location, though not isolated from neighbors, would indicate he was not only seeking new land but a different life style and separation from populated settlements. The entire area between Antietam Creek and the Shenandoah Mts. from the Potomac River north to the Pennsylvania line would not until 1749, six years after Robert's arrival, be designated as a "Hundred" subdivision intended to provide settlement for one hundred colonists (families).

Many accounts of the roads in this part of Maryland during the early years describe most of them as little more than horse trails or bridal paths, muddy and washed away in the summer, rutted and difficult to travel in the winter and absent all together in many needed areas. Some were privately built, while others depended on colonists working together for the common good. Following the formation of Frederick Co. in 1748, roads came under the jurisdiction of the court magistrates and colonists often had to petition the court to get roads maintained or improved. Overseers were appointed by the court to monitor road conditions and surveyors were hired to determine the feasibility and course of new roads.

The Indian attacks, which were savage in their killing, burning, scalping and kidnapping of women and children, caused frontiersmen beyond Conococheague Creek and along the Potomac River to fortify their homes with stockades and other defenses. Often they provided refuge for other families forced from their homes by Indian raids. Gen. Braddock's failure against the French in 1755 and the failure to stop the intrusion of Indians east of Fort Cumberland forced settlers to abandon their homes and seek the safety of the Monocacy settlements. Fort Frederick was an essential defense in this matter. Westward expansion was not considered safe until 1766.

Note by Mary Stephenson: I apologize for the appearance of this deed. The penmanship was so bad, it made the spelling and possible interpretation misleading. The recorder should not have held this position.

In summary, in the heading, the writer wrote George Poe, but throughout the deed, it was spelt Geo Poo, with a signature by the writer (not the actual person) spelt George Poo.

Although the deed was recorded in Frederick County, Maryland, they used Pennsylvania currency to finalize the judgment.

The deed's heading was March Court 1771 – to this I am certain, yet they close out the deed with another 'certain' year – 1768.

Note by Mary Stephenson: This was on the same page as the Geo Poo & Joseph Hardman deed. I thought the spelling of George Rofs was interesting. It costs $10 per page to be printed, so I did not get page 2 of this document on the off chance this person is not related. The recorder is not a 'informative' person and it still not certain what the complain is about.

Isaac (another son) would marry George, Andrew and Adam's sister – Catherine Poe. Isaac appeared before the Justices on behalf of George, to pay his security.
